Updated Preliminary Report of

Assessment of Losses and Needs of Pakistani Media Personnel and Organisations in Areas Affected by the Earthquake of October 8, 2005

Introduction:

On October 8, 2005, an earthquake measuring 7.6 on the Richter scale devastated large parts of North West Frontier Province (NWFP) and Pakistani controlled Azad Jammu and Kashmir (AJK). According to official figures the death toll was estimated at over 73,000, including 17,000 children, and the number of injured is estimated to be over 70,000. Over 400,000 houses have been destroyed and the number of homeless is estimated to be 3.3 million. Shelter and logistics remain urgent priorities. Landslides continue to be a threat to road travellers and aftershocks continue.

Pakistan Press Foundation (PPF) fielded two media assessment missions to earthquake affected areas to assess losses and needs of media personnel and institutions affected by the earthquake. The first mission visited the area from 15 to 23 October, 2005 and the second mission from 9 to 16 November 2005. (Please see Annexure A for note on assessment mission and planned follow-up actions)

This preliminary report is being made public in the interest of promoting discussion, information sharing and improving coordination between the stakeholders concerned with the rehabilitation, reconstruction and development of media in earthquake affected areas.

The missions were undertaken soon after the earthquake and information collected during this emergency period may become outdated in a rapidly changing scenario. All information in this report should be updated by those seeking to use it as a basis for comment or action.

Losses of media personnel and organisations

Journalists and other personnel working for media organisations suffered terrible losses due to the earthquake.

Three hundred and one persons working for the media suffered personal or property losses in the areas covered in the first phase of the mission. Eleven were killed and 19 injured. Eighty-eight family members of media personnel were killed and 20 injured. Two hundred and thirty one houses of media personnel were destroyed and another 70 suffered damages to their houses (please see annexure A).

Out of twenty press clubs and union of journalists offices in the area, premises of fifteen were either destroyed or damaged (please see annexure B). In most cases, furniture and equipment in damaged premises of media organisations were destroyed.

Muzaffarabad is the biggest media centre in the earthquake-affected area. Two daily newspapers, Siasat and Mahasib are published from the city. Being the capital of Azad Kashmir, this city hosts a sizeable Information Department of the AJK government, and stations of state-owned Radio Pakistan and Pakistan Television. It is also home to a large press corps of correspondents representing national and regional newspapers and television channels. The city also has an active press club that had recently received computers, scanners, printers and video camera from the Pakistan government. The equipment is now buried under the rubble of the collapsed building of the press club.

The majority of losses to media personnel and organisations occurred in Muzaffarabad (please see appendix C). Ten media personnel were killed in the city and eleven were injured. Fifty family members of media personnel were killed and another nine were injured. One hundred and nine houses of media personnel were destroyed and another fourteen suffered damages to their houses.

The buildings of the information department have become structurally unstable and may have to be demolished, while buildings housing radio and television stations and the press club have been destroyed. The broadcast tower of Pakistan Television has also been destroyed, but fortunately, the broadcast tower of Radio Pakistan is still standing. The building renting office space to daily newspapers, Siasat and Mahasib has become structurally unstable.

Several houses in the residential colony for the staff of Radio Pakistan collapsed causing loss of life and injury to the family members of radio employees.

After the destruction of the radio station, emergency steps were taken to start an FM service that covers a 45km area through its transmission. Resumption of radio transmissions have enabled survivors to send messages to their family displaced by the earthquake. Officials said that medium wave radio transmission would soon be operational and cover a 145 sq. km area.

Most residents and institutions in Muzaffarabad are living and working in tents. Lack of safe office space is a major problem for rehabilitation of the media. Daily Mahasib and daily Siasat restarted editorial functions from tents, with printing done in Islamabad.

Abbotabad is the only other city in the affected areas with a sizable media presence. Seven daily newspapers are published from this city and all major national and regional newspapers have correspondents based here. Fortunately, media personnel and organisations in Abbotabad were not seriously affected. The only notable damage was minor damage to the ceiling of upper floor of Abbottabad Press Club.

Newspapers in Abbotabad were not published on October 9 due to disruption of electric power but they resumed regular publication the next day. FM 99, the only private sector radio station in the earthquake-affected area, has continued to operate despite interruptions due to frequent power breakdowns.

The town of Balakot, with a population of 30,000, with another 50,000 living in surrounding villages, suffered the greatest devastation. The entire area has been reduced to rubble, with hardly a family that has not suffered loss of family members and destruction to homes and livelihood. Houses of all 17 journalists of Balakot have been destroyed. Three media personnel were injured, twelve family members killed and one seriously injured.

The press corps had ceased to function in Balakot due to the destruction of telecommunication and electricity infrastructure. As an emergency measure, PPF provided journalists remaining in the city with mobile telephones and arranged free airtime from the mobile telephone company Telenor, which had started serving Balakot the same day. This small, but timely, measure allowed journalists in Balakot to start functioning again. The journalists of Balakot recently set up a press club in a tent where they meet and carry out their professional activities.

Bagh, in Azad Kashmir, is another town that has suffered massive damage. One journalist was killed and three injured in this town. Three family members of media journalists were killed and another four were injured. Homes of 27 journalists were destroyed and three were damaged.

The second mission that visited Bagh, a month after the earthquake, found most of the city still in ruins of collapsed homes and shops. There was acrid smell in the air. However there were signs of resumed activities. Huge cranes were busy removing debris to clear way for reconstruction. Tent schools were functioning. Makeshift shops and restaurants had started to reopen. Journalists had started functioning and were planning to set up a temporary press club in a tent.

Other cities visited by the PPF mission where journalists suffered losses of family members and property include Alai, Bafa, Bakot, Batal, Battgram, Chutter Plan, Dheerkot, Dhodhiyal, Gharhi Dupatta, Gharhi Habibullah, Jabar, Jabori, Mansehra, Rawlakot Hattian Bala, Thakot, Bisham, Shangla Hill, Chakothei, Bakot and Shinkiari. Details of cities and towns that have suffered losses to life and property are given in annexure C.

Rehabilitation of media personnel and organisations

The government of Pakistan is planning a reconstruction strategy for the earthquake-affected areas. The government has announced compensation of Rs. 100,000 (US$ 1,700) for each person killed, Rs 50,000 (US$ 850) for loss of limbs and Rs. 25,000 (US$ 425) for other injuries. The government has also announced compensation of Rs 150,000 (US$2,500) for each destroyed house.

According to government sources, no separate assessment was being conducted on media losses and needs.

Journalists of the affected areas were of the view that rehabilitation of the media should be given priority, in view of the crucial role of the media in keeping the world informed of developments in the area and in monitoring effectiveness of rehabilitation and reconstruction activities,. Journalists also suggested they should be issued special identification cards to enable them to access information, which has become more difficult in view of military control of relief operations in the affected areas.

Journalists in many affected areas still lack basic facilities, such as fax and telephones to work and file reports. There is urgent need to provide equipment that will enable local journalists to start sending news reports to national and regional publications and television channels. Press clubs need computers and fax machines, and individual journalists need mobile telephones and digital cameras to become functional again. Journalists in these areas have lost everything and are not in any position to acquire the equipment without external assistance.

In the longer term, media personnel and organisations will need interest free or low interest loans to enable them to acquire professional equipment. Media development organisations could also develop micro-financing programmes to help journalists acquire laptop computers, and fax machines, etc.

Apart from the physical losses, local publications also lost circulation and advertising base in the areas destroyed by the earthquake. The federal government, which is one of the biggest advertisers, should consider emergency measures to increase advertisements to publications catering to readership in the earthquake-affected areas.

Like the rest of the community, many journalists have been traumatised by the earthquake and some among them would need psychiatric counselling on a mid- to long-term basis. Most journalists are homeless, living in tents, with recurring panic due to frequent aftershocks jolting the area.

Need for changes to communication and information policies

The earthquake demonstrated, yet again, that the country is ill served, especially in times of crisis, by the long-standing state policy of not fully opening the electronic media and telecommunication services.

This policy is most severe in Azad Kashmir where successive governments in Pakistan have not allowed the operation of independent radio stations or private mobile telecommunication services.

Thus, when massive landslides caused by the earthquake blocked roads to many parts of the affected areas and destroyed landline telephone and telegraph systems, the country suddenly found itself without any means of communicating with millions of people devastated by the calamity. Victims in the remote towns, villages and hamlets that dot these mountainous regions found themselves isolated, trapped and without any way of communicating their plight and needs to those in a position to help.

The clearing of roads has taken many days and some areas are still inaccessible. Helicopters, which are the most effective way of providing emergency relief, continue to be in short supply. Communication with areas made inaccessible by blocked roads could have substantially improved the efficiency and effectiveness of relief operations by helicopters as well as by other means.

The earthquake destroyed the only broadcast facility of the state owned Radio Pakistan in Muzaffarabad, the capital of Azad Kashmir. While some parts of Azad Kashmir could receive signals from Islamabad, large areas could not be reached by radio. Thus, information on relief operations and guidance on coping with the aftermath of the earthquake could not be provided effectively to people in the affected areas.

The Pakistan government realized the desperate situation caused by lack of telecommunication facilities and allowed private mobile telecommunication companies to operate in the area. Private mobile companies responded swiftly and started operations within a matter of days, allowing victims of the earthquake to communicate with their friends and families as well as those in authority and the relief community. The government also gave permission to six private commercial FM radio stations urging them to start operating immediately.

While these policy changes are welcome, they are not at all adequate to meet the needs of the earthquake-affected areas, nor of the country at large.

Need for community radio

The earthquake-affected areas comprise many small isolated population centres in mountainous region that cannot be covered by the centralised FM transmission from urban centres. Nor would it be feasible for commercial radio stations to operate in small population centres with limited commercial potential. The best solution for the provision of radio service to the earthquake affected communities, as well as for many smaller towns and villages throughout Pakistan, would be the development of community radio. The government should move swiftly in formulating policies that encourage the development of the community radio sector.

The legislation creating the Pakistan Electronic Media Regulatory Authority (PEMRA) to issue licences to electronic media has provisions for community radio stations but, so far, the government has granted community radio licences to only a handful of universities and NGOs.

There is no clear policy regarding community radio and diverse concerns have been expressed unofficially that community radio could fall into the hands of those who would promote sectarianism, religious extremism, and separatism or because of foreign funding, promote agenda and values that are against the country's ideological, cultural and religious traditions. The prospects, potentials and challenges of community radio need to be seriously discussed so that a policy can be formulated that can address genuine concerns, while at the same time promotes the rapid development of community radio in the country.

Community radio can play a crucial role in promoting dialogue among citizens on the priorities and directions of reconstruction activities and in giving people a voice in monitoring the fairness, transparency and effectiveness of relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction activities. It is therefore important that the government not merely reviews its restrictive policy on licensing of community radio stations, but also formulate a programme of training and technical support to encourage establishment of community radio stations all over Pakistan.

As interim measures, licences could be granted to local government institutions, civil society organisations, and press clubs and other media organisations, first in the affected areas and later throughout Pakistan. Many of these institutions have the commitment and human resources and, with proper support, can develop capacities for establishing and running community radio stations within a relatively short time.

At present private radio stations are not allowed to broadcast news and current affairs programmes, except those produced by the state-owned radio and television. Such restrictions are not only reminiscent of the authoritarian eras, but have severely limited the contribution that radio can make in keeping listeners in Pakistan aware of developments around them. These restrictions should be removed immediately as the priority for people affected by the earthquake, is for news and information rather than entertainment programmes.

Need for effective access to information laws

Transparency in the use of aid and other contributions from national and international donors will be the key to the continuation of support in the long term. Support for rehabilitation and reconstruction will be required for many years, and this will only be possible if donors know that their money is being well spent. While the President and the Prime Minister of Pakistan have repeatedly assured there would be no misuse of rehabilitation and reconstruction aid funds, institutional mechanism to enable citizens and the media to monitor such claims are lacking.

The record of governments in providing access to information remains poor. Pakistan's Freedom of Information Ordinance, 2002 contains many flaws and weaknesses that need immediate remedy and reform. To make matters worse, even information that should be provided under this inadequate law is rarely provided.

As interim measure, those at the highest levels of government should declare and ensure that information requested under the ordinance is provided promptly and fully. For this to happen, the government would need to create awareness among its officials and devote necessary resources to handle access to information requests promptly.

The law itself needs to be reformed and the process of consultation should be initiated at the earliest with different stakeholders including journalists, media organisations, civil society organisations and parliamentarians. Other laws, such as the Official Secrets Act that promotes the culture of secrecy needs to be repealed or drastically reformed. It is also important for the government to reassure that the excuse of national security will not be used to deny information about relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction activities in the earthquake affected areas.

The newly created government institutions for relief and reconstruction, such as the Federal Relief Commission and the Earthquake Rehabilitation and Reconstruction Authority, should be required to proactively disclose information relating to planning, implementing and monitoring relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction activities. These institutions should devote necessary resources to promptly handle information requested under the access to information laws.

At present, the access to information laws do not exist at the provincial level. Since the provincial governments are undertaking many relief and rehabilitation activities, it is necessary for the governments of NWFP and Azad Kashmir to implement effective access to information laws at the earliest. Local governments also need to take on a proactive role in disseminating information regarding relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction.

Due to the ineffectiveness of the access to information laws, journalists have not taken much interest in using these laws. There is a need to continue efforts to train and encourage journalists to use the access to information laws to gather information from official sources.

Capacity development of the media in the earthquake affected areas

The areas affected by the earthquake are among the most backward in the country as far as the media is concerned. The needs of the media in these areas are diverse and include developing the professional skills of journalists, including the writing skills of women; developing press clubs; providing training in the use of computers and Internet; training non-media organisations working in the area, skills to work effectively with media; and modernising the offices of the official information departments in far flung districts.

The capacity of journalists already working in the area needs to be developed so that they can play a role in monitoring crucial rehabilitation and reconstruction activities, and keep the country informed of the needs of their communities.

Many communities in these areas do not have trained journalists who could report on their communities hence there is a need for sustained efforts to train and develop a corps of journalists in all parts of the affected areas.

Media publishers and media development organisations should also come forward with programmes for training radio journalists as well as for other aspects of managing community radio stations.

While media coverage has generally been very good in providing information of the affected areas to the country and the world at large, a glaring weakness in the coverage is the lack of women's voices. Problems regarding women have not been adequately highlighted due to gender segregation that limits the access of male journalists to women who comprise half the population of the area. For women to have a say in shaping the direction of relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction efforts, it is necessary to train local women to write for the media. Local journalists and press clubs need to play a positive role in creating a safe and friendly environment to encourage the entry of women in this profession.

There has been a dramatic growth in the use of the Internet in Pakistan. Unfortunately, the areas affected by the earthquake are remote and the Internet reach to these areas is amongst the lowest in the country. There is a need to consider innovative ways to providing the Internet connectivity to remote areas of this region and to train to use of computers and the Internet.

In addition to the federal and provincial governments, a range of institutions - including donor agencies, relief organisations, national and local civil society organisations and local governments – will remain involved in relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction efforts. It is important that the local media understands the functioning, role, responsibilities and limitations of these institutions. These organisations need to understand the role of the media to monitor and report independently, and be skilled in working effectively with the media. Promoting professional interaction between journalists and these organisations would lead to better media coverage of reconstruction activities.

Priority should also be given to the establishment of press clubs where they do not exist, while existing press clubs that have been damaged should be rehabilitated on emergency basis so that journalistic activity is fully reactivated.

The earthquake demonstrated the inadequacy of the official information departments that are supposed to facilitate local and national media in gathering information from far-flung areas. The presence of official information departments outside the capital cities is often minimal and is restricted to only a few districts. There is a need for the NWFP provincial government as well as the government of Azad Kashmir to establish properly equipped information department offices at the districts level.

Challenges of working in sensitive regions

The areas affected by the earthquake are among the most sensitive and politically volatile regions in the world and include the Pakistani and Indian administered Kashmir and areas bordering Afghanistan and Pakistan. There have been persistent allegations of this region being the centre of militancy and extremism.

The earthquake offers challenges to the international community as well to governments in the region to develop policies and programmes that reduce the need for resorting to militancy. Rehabilitation and reconstruction activities should be planned and implemented swiftly, transparently and with full participation of the local population.

A large number of diverse national and international organisations working in the area need to be open in their operations to counter allegations that attempts are being made to promote political, religious and social agendas in the garb of relief activities. The local population needs to be kept informed of developments through the local media, to discourage public misconceptions that can create hurdles in the relief and reconstruction activities. The local media also offers an opportunity for international organisations to win the trust of the local communities, thereby increasing the chance of success in their work. Sensitivities of the local population, voiced through reports by local journalists, can serve as advance warning of problems ahead that can be addressed promptly.

Note on PPF assessment mission and proposed follow-up activities

The Pakistan Press Foundation PPF fielded two media assessment missions to areas in North West Frontier Province of Pakistan and the Pakistan administered Azad Jammu and Kashmir (AJK) that were affected by the devastating earthquake on October 8, 2005.

The objectives of the assessment are:

1. To identify relief and rehabilitation needs of affected journalists and their immediate families.
2. To identify the immediate and long term needs for development of media institutions and infrastructure.
3. To identify ways of promoting and supporting an effective role of the media in monitoring relief efforts and rehabilitation.

This updated preliminary report covers the first and second of the assessment missions to the affected areas.

The first mission, from 15 to 23 October, 2005 visited Abbotabad, Mansehra, Balakot, Batgram, Battal, Shinkiari, Garhi Habibullah, Bufa, Jabori, Jabar, Dhodhiyal in NWFP and Muzaffarabad, Garhi Dopata, Majhoi, Siran, Kohala Bakot, Dheerkot, Arja, Bagh and Rawlakot in AJK.

Areas that could not be visited because the roads were blocked due to landslides were covered in the second mission from 9 to 16 November 2005. Towns in NWFP covered by the second mission included Havilian, Abbottabad, Balakot, Garhi Habibullah, Mansehra, Batgram, Chattar Plane, Thakot, Bisham, Shangla Hill Dodhial, Sinkiari and Battalin. Areas in Azad Kashmir covered visited by the second mission included Muzaffarabad, Garhi Dopatta, Hattian Bala, Chikothi, Kohala, Bakot, Dhirkot and Bagh.

The first mission comprised Owais Aslam Ali, Secretary General, PPF; Nasir Aijaz, Bureau Chief, Pakistan Press International (PPI) news agency, Karachi; Musawir Shahid, Network Coordinator PPF; Zia Mazhar, head, PPI Photo Service; and Naveed Akram Abbasi, correspondent of daily Nawa-e-Waqt in Bakot, NWFP bordering Azad Jammu and Kashmir. The second mission comprised Fazal Qureshi, Vice Chairman, PPF; Musawir Shahid; Suleman Mushtaq Photographer PPI News Agency, Islamabad and Naveed Akram Abbasi

The missions held meetings with survivors, journalists, editors, social workers, representatives of national and international NGOs engaged in relief operations, officials of WHO and other international bodies, government officials, army personnel and ministers of NWFP and AJK and Pakistan government to ascertain the losses and needs of media personnel and organisations.

The mission also met with the Advisor to the Prime Minister of AJK for Information, Raja Farooq Haider, Revenue Minister and In charge Relief Operations, Malik Muhammad Nawaz and Mr. Tahir Farooq, Relief Commissioner in Muzaffarabad, and Provincial Minister for Information, NWFP, Asif Iqbal Dawoodzai and Secretary Information Muhammad Afzal Khan in Peshawar, and Anisa Zeb Tahirkheli, Minister of State for Information and Broadcasting and raised the issues relating to losses and needs of media personnel and institutions discussed in this report.

PPF plans to undertake the following actions as follow up to the assessment mission:

1. Seek comments and suggestions on the report from all stakeholders concerned with rehabilitation and development of media in earthquake-hit areas.
2. Organise two regional consultations on needs of media in NWFP and Kashmir for journalists from the earthquake-affected areas to consider this report and comments by other stakeholders from the affected areas.
3. Organise a national conference on the needs and role of the media in the reconstruction of the earthquake affected areas with participants from media from NWFP and AJK as well as by other stakeholders interested in the reconstruction and development of the media in these areas.
4. Prepare a database of media relief and development projects in the earthquake-affected areas by local, national and international organisations so that duplication is avoided, and there can be better coordination and cooperation between different organisations.

Pakistan Press Foundation

The Pakistan Press Foundation (PPF) has since been involved in assisting the development of independent media in Pakistan since 1992. It does so by conducting training programmes, research and documentation, and campaigning to defend and promote freedom of the press.

The PPF regularly organizes workshops and seminars, in rural centres as well as in the cities on issues facing the Pakistani media. From the onset, the organization has aimed at the improvement of professional skills and helping raise journalists' awareness on professional, social, political and economic issues.

In addition to capacity building the PPF is committed to the promotion of freedom of the press in Pakistan. PPF organizes training programmes on press freedom, the rights of journalists and journalistic ethics. PPF is also playing a leading role in promoting the use of the recently introduced access to information laws and is involved in efforts to improve these laws.

In 1999, the PPF established the PPF-Vicky Zeitlin Media Library and Training Centre, which house an extensive collection on the media and issues of interest to Pakistani media. Training workshops and seminars are regularly held at the training centre.

The PPF is involved in research and documentation on mass communication in Pakistan. The weekly PPF Media Review, in English and Urdu, compiles important news about the media. The organization has produced a number of reports and publications.
